American Center for Reproductive Medicine

The Cleveland Clinic's American Center for Reproductive Medicine was established in 1993. The Center is dedicated to its mission of research, physician education and patient care. It has an international reputation for excellence in innovative research in human fertility and is dedicated to disseminating its results. Research papers from the Center staff are selected regularly for publication in distinguished specialty medical journals. Our Center has published about 720 scientific papers and review articles in peer reviewed scientific journals and has the largest number of publications in the field of andrology, male infertility and assisted reproduction in the world.

ACRM offers research fellowships, hands-on training in human assisted reproduction, and summer mentorship opportunities. We also offer diagnostic & therapeutic services for infertile couples and cancer patients. In the past 26 years, more than 1,000 scientists, physicians, researchers, reproductive medicine professionals and students from over 55 countries have trained at our Center.
